This year, the module focuses on research methodology and its use in management research. The recent years have witnessed an increasing interest towards constructionist and critical approaches to organization studies, however, the relation of these new currents to the traditional concerns of methodology, and to the input into practitioner issues, has remained unclear. The aim of this course is to explore the different research paradigms – positivist, constructionist and postmodern – available for the students of management, and to discuss their philosophical underpinnings as well as their distinctive ways of responding to the calls for “practitioner relevance”. The course suits advanced undergraduate and beginning doctoral students in management and organization. It can also be taken in conjunction with advanced or doctoral studies in other business management disciplines.

The general objective of this course is to increase the understanding of the students of the marketing and internalization of the high tech firms. The aim is to describe and analyze the current state of these issues in the chosen case firms through examination of the focal products and their position in the markets. In more detail the objectives of this course are to provide the student knowledge of the typical features of high-tech marketing and internalization, to make the student acquainted with firms developing and using high technology and to develop the abilities of the student to collect, analyze and report qualitative data.

Recommended or required reading:

Mohr, J.: Marketing of High-Technology Products and Innovations, 2001, and other material named by the lecturer.

Assessment methods and criteria:

6–10 h lectures, 2 h group meetings and xx hours case-sessions and presentations (depending on the number of participating groups). The students are divided into multicultural teams of 3–4 persons. Each team is introduced to a case firm, which is located in or around Oulu and is operating in high-tech markets. The groups make an analytical written report on the case firm and present it to other students in the case-sessions. The number of students is limited. The selection is based on the amount of previous studies in marketing (in economic sciences) or in software business. The course requires registration in advance.
